DAVID HUNTER GOES INTERNATIONAL

An excellent revue of David Hunter's book “The Covenanters of Carrick” appeared in the “On Your Doorstep” section of the October issue of the Scots Magazine.

The book is available from the Society and this revue has resulted in an upsurge in requests for copies and these requests are now coming from people who have local connections but have not yet seen the Maybole Website.

Not only has “The Covenanters of Carrick” now become our best seller, the inclusion of a membership form for the Society and a full publications list has resulted in requests for other books as well. All this generates very welcome revenue for the Society.

COMPETITION WINNER

In the last but one issue of the Community news the Society ran a survey to find out the usage of the Resource Centre for Local and Family History. To encourage people to return their answers, all replies were entered into a competition with a prize of a Family History completed as far as possible back to the early 1800's.

Unfortunately Agnes is of Irish ancestry so she asked to get that of her husband Calum done instead.

In the same month as the spotlight was placed very firmly on Scotland with the opening of the new Scottish Parliament building, the British? Broadcasting Corporation came up with their “major new BBC initiative” to help people find their roots. As we are well aware in Maybole, any source of help in researching family history is of major benefit to individuals all over the world and has a resultant impact on the local economy in attracting visitors making the ultimate journey in search of the historical location of their ancestors. I was therefore looking forward to this new series, anticipating that it would encourage many more people to start the journey in search of their past and show everyone throughout the UK - and those who watch BBC programmes abroad with all the new technology available now – how much easier and cheaper to access, and how much more complete are the Scottish records.

This BBC initiative is in association with BBC History Magazine, Ancestors (the magazine of the English Family Records Centre) and the National Archives. Is this already a missed opportunity from ScotlandsPeople and the National Archives of Scotland or did the anglophiles at the BBC not give them the chance to be included? Certainly ScotlandsPeople seem to me to be spending more money promoting Islay Whisky than their own records!

The first thing I received was the 32 page pull-out supplement in the BBC History Magazine. I have no complaints about the magazine itself as I make sure I get every copy and find the coverage for the whole of Britain very good indeed. This cannot be said about the supplement. Apart from being factually incorrect and misleading, there is very little mention of Scottish records and no mention whatsoever that our records (not only the indexes!) are available very cheaply over the internet.

The Radio Times covering the week of the first programme in the series had a much simplified, 4 page guide which was slightly better in that it mentioned correctly that Scottish Census returns were available online at www.scotlandsppeople.gov.uk and that wills are available at www.scottishdocuments.com however the crucial fact that certificates of birth, marriage and death in Scotland for a very large period are also available online at the former site, was missed out completely.

Amazingly the best free guide I received was from the National Archives (the mainly English archives) which included good clear sections on a number of topics including, crucially, Scotland and the International Genealogical Index.

All the BBC publications, the trailers for the programmes and the programmes themselves point you in the direction of the BBC website at bbc.co.uk/familyhistory for further information. Not only do I find this website difficult to navigate and lacking in Scottish content, it is obvious from the number of requests for help in finding good websites that I have received due to the upsurge in interest in family history caused by the programmes, that others experience the same difficulties.

Finally, the television series itself is only two programmes old so hopefully it will improve as it progresses. So far the only comment I can make is that it is anglophile and sensationalist and would probably have the opposite effect than that intended by putting people off starting their own search completely. I was surprised that there was not a link to a special counselling service after the first programme as it certainly left me feeling totally depressed – but then again that was maybe a combination of all the disappointments I have received after looking forward to what could have been an excellent series!
